

Coming Soon to a Rainbow Near You

A new app called Rainbow Chase pulls in weather data near the phone's location and points the user in the direction where it is likely there will be a visible rainbow. It also allows the user to upload photos of the rainbows into a gallery and post them to the Rainbow Chase website for others to see. The app is available at the Apple App Store, under Rainbow Chases Weather.

The creator, Steven Businger, is a professor of the Department of Atmospheric Sciences at the University of Hawaii, and an avid fan of the rainbows in his home state. Right now, his app only works on the Hawaiian island of Oahu, but the plan is to make it available to the rest of the U.S., followed by Asia and Europe, before long. The app may also evolve to provide guidance for viewing other atmospheric optics, such as halos, coronas, and brilliant sunsets.

If you don't currently live in Oahu, then you can view the samples from the rainbow gallery, including rare double-rainbows, here. And you can make a note to download this app the next time you plan a Hawaiian vacation.
